Mark has a far-reaching complex business litigation practice in which he represents manufacturers, medical device companies, banks, railroads and other clients in a wide variety of matters including trade secrets, product liability, employment and contract disputes.

Mark's recent work includes:

- Defending and counseling medical device manufacturers with respect to independent sales representative termination issues
- Protecting the interests of manufacturers in the firearms, construction equipment, and other industries against product liability suits, including asbestos torts
- Representing railroads in complex commercial disputes and high stakes injury and death cases
- Representing clients in complex commercial real estate and landlord/tenant disputes

Mark's work also includes litigating disputes among manufacturers, dealers, and distributors involving termination, nonpayment and competition, and defending banks and other financial institutions against consumer claims brought under state and federal consumer protection laws, including class actions.

Known as practical and objective, Mark counsels clients seeking to implement policies and procedures designed to reduce litigation risk. When litigation is unavoidable, Mark is a credible and results-oriented advocate in court and arbitration.
